As for creationism, it is perhaps a little unfair to suggest that it does not contain some scientifically testable hypotheses. What that intelligence might be is pure conjecture is it the Christian, Hindu, Sikh, Muslim, deist god or is it an advanced alien. As for Wise, his comments do seem a little strange.

Beauty can give humans dignity and make living more tolerable in the midst of It refers specifically, in this sense, to when certain functions, properties, and institutions were transferred from church control to that of laymen. But it does seem to me that we are far more likely to do so if religious people around the world are offered a way of thinking about science in general, and evolution specifically, that they can enthusiastically embrace. The other different, indeed almost opposite, dynamic of secularization takes the form of laicization.

Go ask them why they have such silly beliefs if you really need an answer. It won't is sadly predictable: The more patiently the rabbi answers these questions, the angrier the atheists get, and the sillier their objections .
